Essay 2. When i was growing up back in days in Rwanda, I always thought that education was the only way in which my life may really change. That dream made it not easy to be reached by believing in it. Among the biggest obstacles I encountered was further studies in spite of financial constraints and a sense of not being able to see the opportunities. At one point I became almost hopeless. I recall my sitting and contemplating my future because I was not sure whether or not I could still pursue my studies because of economic reasons. I could not believe that something that I was ready to struggle to get could remain beyond my reach. That is when I started to feel kept in place, driven, but with no purpose. Deciding to keep going forward instead of backing away was an important decision I made. Leading was more about necessity than courage. so I started looking through graduate programs and breaking down the steps of the application process to build my academic history gradually. In the beginning, everything was crashing down on me at once. There were lots of setbacks, unexpected doors shut, confidence was lost from time to time, and there were lots of questions from myself about my ability to succeed, my value, or my place in school. This led me to understand that I was not the only one, as I proceeded in this journey. A lot of students surrounding me shared the same dream and did not have the information or advice to go with me. This fact altered my attitude. Initially a personal fight turned out to be more. I started assisting fellow students in knowing how to seek scholarship and do their study in a foreign country. To achieve the ability to guide others, it made all the things that I had experienced meaningful. The experience had an impact on me in a way that I did not anticipate. I got stronger, more disciplined and realized the responsibility that I hold, not only to myself, but also to those who seek guidance. It also allowed me to find a sense of purpose, to contribute to such a solution to bring education closer to other people. In the present day, I do not perceive my problems as a limitation. Rather, I consider them a source of my development. They have made my mind more willing to work hard and get a higher education which will enable me to serve more students who are struggling just as I used to.
